

Concept of a Multiverse Story

What about a story where one person is connected to every variant of themselves in every universe, in this world there are limited universes being copied every time a living being moves and does something, so he wouldn't be an infinite person because infinite people can't have specific personality traits shine through

The voices, the pain and emotion of every single variant would be in him... or her, let's say both

Both's body would be like a video game character clipping into and out of their own copy pasted avatars all moving differently but enough of them doing the same thing so that collection of people would be boths core personality

Screw it I'll call both a He and She sometimes

She wouldn't speak to others since he can't even hear his own voice, he can only look at mouth flaps of people to find out what they're saying which makes it difficult for him to understand so he's way less social and understanding towards people

He'd also be selfish but not so selfish that he'd harm every single person in every single universe because as long as there's a similar enough clone of the person he needs to kill to reach his goals he won't care

Since his emotion is determined by what most of them feel like at any given time he very randomly does something unexpected like screaming in fear while running away after laughing at a funny joke

His voice is like a crowd, when he gets angry he sounds like a broken computer and his mouth looks like squiggles (since she's a 2d character in my head I thought of it like that even if some universes does have 3d technically he doesn't live in true 2d he just looks 2d because if he was 2d he wouldn't be able to move in a 3d space)

He can never die as long as his other variants are still alive, he tried killing himself and the only thing he did by doing that is getting rid of the memories of his own life and past only being stuck with the memories of his other clones, the more different they are the harder it is for him to remember things so if there was someone completely different he would only think it was déjà vu

So his goal is to destroy every life on the planet just to get a smidge of a break, slowing down the universal copying at least a little bit so he won't feel any more pain and suffering than he already is, since Humans are most of the universe's active life forms if he won in most of his goals the rest wouldn't destroy their variants of the planet leaving SOME copies of those people meaning their lives wouldn't matter if he killed them

One of his variants had a way more desperate plan, one from universe made the worst of the worst chain of events

After his planet blew up from the sun after millions of years of him being alone isolated after all humans died in a civil war she flew to another planet, unable to breathe in space for decades, he'd build a space ship to fly to other planets to absorb her variants that he'd understand very well since the only voices he could hear and understand in all that time was theirs, he'd be able to convince them to be like him so that when he'd absorb them to gain more power his main goal would stay the same and wouldn't be overshadowed by the core personalities of everyone else, also he'd need to really convince them because the absorbtion process includes ripping out the heart of his variant and fusing that to himself first which would hurt for both of them, every time he'd fuse with them his voices would become twice as strong and the physical pain twice as worse

So much so that on the last part, the last variant he'd need to absorb even if he wore the clothes like he was a knight or a king of the world, tall and mighty he'd still move like an old man with a broken spine with a walking stick, there would be so many copies inside him clipping in and out that the only thing on his face you could see is his sad eyes that looked like pits leading to an infinite void of darkness

And he'd continue her journeys to absorb his variants until he'd have so much strength and mass condensed into such a small space he'd be able to become a black hole while also making every variant of everything combine into one just like she was so that even when he'd absorb every multiverse in existence she'd make everyone feel exactly what he felt like for all that time

The one that wished for earth to die would be stopped by him to absorb him and since the one that wished for earth to stop existing didn't want ALL of the copies to be destroyed and the variants of himself that weren't fused to him having to be absorbed like everything else he wouldn't allow it

So the universe destroyer would try over and over to do it piecefully, avoiding his attacks and never attacking until the earthling would give up

Oh also the universes would be oversimplified versions of ours like some only having red suns, some only having blue, some only having trees, some only having grass, some only having red trees some only having blue grass but a few of them would have combinations of those by people traveling there from other universes and adding the resources of their own universe into them and the story would take place in one of those

After absorbing everything, making everyone feel what he felt like by fusing them together, after all that pain to get as much power as possible apparently it wasn't enough to keep it all inside of his body, to quiet down everything by condensing it all enough to make a pebble, so his body would grow and then burst having everything he condensed fly out

And now here we are